Document form Record type	Correspondence
Acquisition	The letters by Alfred Marshall were given by Miss Foxwell to Mary Paley Marshall, and by her to J. M. Keynes: see Foxwell 1/82. Keynes' letters were presumably returned directly to him by Miss Foxwell. Others may have been passed on with either of these batches. The letters to Beeton were given to Miss Foxwell by Alan Beeton; those to Sir George Darwin were given to the Library by his daughter, Margaret Keynes, in 1969 and 1971.
Content	Letters to Herbert Somerton Foxwell (1883-1917), mostly from John Maynard Keynes and Alfred Marshall; and a few written by Foxwell to Henry Beeton and Sir George Darwin.
Free field	The envelopes, most of which survive, were addressed to Foxwell at one or other of his Cambridge addresses (1 Harvey Rd, or St John's) unless otherwise stated.
Notes	Herbert Somerton Foxwell b. 17 June 1849, Shepton Mallet, Somerset, son of an iron merchant. Married Olive May Dorrington July 1898, two daughters. Admitted Pensioner St John's College, Cambridge February 1868; B.A. 1871; Whewell Scholar in International Law 1872. Elected Fellow St John's College 1874; college lecturer in Moral Sciences 1875. Professor of Political Economy, University College London 1881-1922. President Royal Economic Society 1929-1931. Died 3 August 1936.

Summary	Thanks for his letter, and glad Foxwell agrees about [Karl] Pearson. "There are very few cases, I think, in which his elaborate methods tell one anything which was not fairly obvious without them, and the cases, in which they appear to give you more definite results, are, as a rule, precisely those cases in which the validity of applying such methods at all is most open to doubt. But he's a dreadful man with whom to involve oneself in controversy!"

Summary	Discusses papers he is setting for an examination for which Foxwell is apparently also a fellow examiner. Cannot fairly comment on [David] Heron [an assistant to Karl Pearson] but tends to view him unfavourably. Reminds Foxwell that he [Keynes] hopes to receive at least a first instalment of 'Contributions to the History of English Banking' for inclusion in the December issue of the Economic Journal.

Summary	"I quite agree with you that there is no reason in the world why the India Office should make such a mystery of their currency. But their difficulty partly is that none of those connected with the place who make speeches understand the currency, so that they are very short of spokesmen in these matters. To turn to another matter - can you tell me the answer to these questions? - (1) on what terms does the Bank [of England] get gold coined by the mint? (2) when the gold is at the mint in the act of being coined, is it or is it not included at the same time in the returns of the Bank's reserves?"

Summary	Thanks Foxwell for comments on Keynes's Indian Memorandum ['Recent Developments of the Indian Currency Question', 1911] which was originally prepared as notes for an address given to the [Royal] Economic Society and printed by the Government of India without his knowledge. Had he known, he would have clarified several points some of which gave rise to Foxwell's criticism. Others are dealt with in his forthcoming book ['Indian Currency and Finance' (Macmillan, 1913)]. Agrees that increased use of gold by India would tend to lower world prices in the short term, and that "the recent absorption of so much gold by India has been providential for this country in its effects on prices." Both points discussed in his book, in which he hopes Foxwell will find less to criticise. For the text of the Memorandum, and a fuller explanation of its publication, see Elizabeth Johnson, (ed), 'The Collected Writings of John Maynard Keynes, Vol. XV, pp. 65-87.

Summary	"Since I wrote the above, your review of my book ['Indian Currency and Finance'] has reached me. Very many thanks for it. It is by far the most interesting review (not to say the most generous) that I have received", feels immodest to be printing it in his own Journal. Clarifies and in some cases defends his position vis-a-vis Foxwell's comments. "I am grateful for your praise of my statistics. Other critics have not noticed them, supposing, perhaps, that they are just copied out of the nearest blue book. But I believe the tables took me as long as the whole of the rest of the book put together. I'd challenge anyone else in England or India to get out the table on p.121, for example.
Summary	"With regard to the State Bank, when writing my book I didn't think it practical politics and so, while always believing in it, dealt cursorily with the topic and tried to devise palliatives. I may say (in confidence) that I have brought the R[oyal] Commission round in the course of the last few months to practically everything in the book. But in the meantime, through thinking about the thing more thoroughly, I have come to distrust my own palliatives, and to lay more and more emphasis on the State Bank. The fruit of this change of mind is to be found in the enclosed memorandum. I should like you to see this, but it is to be regarded for the present as a strictly private document."
Free field	Evidently an annex to something else, possibly the confidential memorandum referred to at the end of the text quoted above and no longer found with the correspondence. The pagination is self-contained, the letter lacks salutation and is signed "JMK" without other ending. Annotated in ink at the top of the first page, in Foxwell's hand, "Keynes [underlined] on my review of his book. Indian Currency etc."

Summary	Asks if Foxwell will review [Hartley] Withers' 'Lombard Street and the War' and [William Ramage] Lawson's 'British War Finance', expressing his own views freely, using theirs as a peg, and make it an article as much as a review. Summary	Sending copy of [William Ramage] Lawson's book ['British War Finance'] under separate cover but has no review copy of [Hartley] Withers's book ['Lombard Street and the War']. Does Foxwell have a copy or will he buy one at the expense of the Royal Economic Society? Glad he will do the article [see Foxwell 1/15/1]. Agrees profoundly about need to curtail consumption. "I have no doubt that, six months later than we ought, we shall embark on something really drastic." Will let him know later about Newmarch lectures. Supposes he [Keynes] must get Treasury sanction for his proposed subject. Is now very well, having to work very hard but enjoying it immensely "as I am now able to deal with all the questions I am most interested in."

Summary	Has got permission from Chancellor of Exchequer to give the Newmarch lectures on the subject of the War Finance of the Continental Powers and is writing to the Secretary of University College [London] giving particulars. Proposes to lecture on Tuesdays at 6, beginning October 26. Complains about premature action by Dr. Gregory Foster in inviting the Chancellor to preside at one of the lectures before Keynes had received the latter's permission to give them. Press reportage on the lectures strictly forbidden. "The authorities of the College must remember that the position of a civil servant who gives lectures on a subject so nearly connected with his official work is a somewhat delicate one." Hopes Foxwell is making progress with his reviews for the December Economic Journal.

Summary	Was thinking of something of the nature of the old Quarterly Review for Foxwell's review-article. "As part-author of [Edwin Samuel] Montagu's speech I naturally agree with it. The battle of finance is being fiercely fought behind the scenes, and the Treasury at least are not behindhand with their warnings. The difficulty is that the conscriptionist party, which is beyond measure stupid, regards any counsels for the moderation of expenditure as little better than a bluff and a sophistry aimed at their particular schemes."

Summary	Many thanks for first instalment of excellent article. Suggests clarification of one sentence. Can tell Foxwell in confidence that view expressed in his article is strongly held in the Treasury, but great pressure against it from the City. Is now almost entirely occupied with British financial relations with Allies and European Neutrals. "And this is steadily becoming more than one man can really do, Russia alone now occupying more than half my time."

Summary	Apparently part of a bundle of letters from Marshall to Foxwell presented by Foxwell's daughter to Mary Paley Marshall in 1938. She in turn sent them to J. M. Keynes under cover of a letter of 22 June 1938 [Foxwell 1/82]. He presumably deposited them in the Marshall Library.

Summary	"I hope it will be decided to complete Jevons' diagrams, at all events in cases in which there is no doubt as to the figures which he would have used in completing them. In an age in which "Quack-statistics" are frequently appearing it is I think very important to preserve and make as prominent as possible all really good work. Jevons wrote so conscientiously with so much careful preparation, and with such good judgment that I used to care for his statistical work more than for that of almost any one else".
Summary	Is against postponing publication of Jevons's Financial and Social Essays. "If one half comes out first, I fancy people will think they will wait till the other half comes out: and by that time the whole thing is a little stale."
Summary	"I think many people will be surprised at finding how important Jevons' social essays are, when they come to be collected; but I don't think their full importance will be seen unless they are looked at in connection with his views on applied economics. For my part I would rather delay the more forward half than publish one part without the other."
Summary	"P.S. As a compromise the diagrams might be followed by a half-page of statistics in a footnote bringing the figures up to date. This could be done cheaply and quickly. I think there would be danger in continuing Jevons' tables of prices in his 1865 paper unless you have much fuller information than is published of the way in which he got at them, e.g. his results differ much from those of the Economist (for a different set of commodities) for the years 60-65.
Summary	"Also if the continuation of the diagrams would prima facie contradict any of the new work you are going to publish of his there might be something to be said against putting the figures in. If he had lived he would no doubt have continued the figures; but then he would have explained away the apparent contradiction by supplementing his theory or in some other way.
Summary	"Thanks for the note about [Frederick Morton] Eden. It has occurred to me that Eden may rise in price: so I am rather tempted to buy it. I will go over the copy I have here when I can get time and perhaps write to Maggs for it."

Summary	Foxwell should not vex himself about Cantillon's book [see Foxwell 1/31]. He himself has no current wish to read it. "Only Mary is going in for the history of economic theory in connection with group D, and was fascinated by what Jevons said of him." If they come to Cambridge at Easter, she will be able to borrow Foxwell's copy, but it is too valuable to send by rail. Summary	Thanks for the Malthus. It is a very nice copy. Has heard at fourth hand that [Arnold] Toynbee in a recent lecture had given offence by something he said about the working classes. Asks Foxwell to alert him to "sunken rocks to be avoided". Hears Toynbee is unwell, so doesn't like to write to him.

Summary	Apparently part of a bundle of letters from Marshall to Foxwell presented by Foxwell's daughter to Mary Paley Marshall in 1938. She in turn sent them to J. M. Keynes under cover of a letter of 22 June 1938 [Foxwell 1/82]. He presumably deposited them in the Marshall Library.
Content
Summary	"Thanks for your most interesting letter. It told me exactly what I wanted to know. I am very sorry for T. [Toynbee]. I don't admire him any the less for it. I quite agree with you that it would not be fair for any one else to bring out his papers. There is no hurry about their appearing. I am not absolutely certain that I shall not publish my lectures. I do not fancy they go over much of T's ground." Repeats apology over misunderstanding about British Association [see Foxwell 1/33/1].

Summary	Mrs. Toynbee, answering his letter of condolence, said that in all the notices of Toynbee that have appeared, "his life and personality have been dwelt on mostly...people think of these rather than of him as an economist" and she wished somebody would address that aspect. Marshall has written back explaining why he does not feel he can do it, hopes Foxwell would be willing but has not mentioned that possibility to her. Thought the article in the Economist was "sensible, but hard". Has not seen others apart from short notice in the Times. "The mortality among those whom the world can least afford to lose has been frightful."
Summary	Marshall's plan to come to Cambridge for day or two on March 20 [error for April 20], staying with [Dr Charles] Taylor [Master of St John's College].
Summary	Is looking forward to nearly 6 months almost uninterrupted work at his book ['Principles']. Will not take time to publish his lectures on [Henry George's] 'Progress and Poverty'.

Summary	Mrs. Toynbee's letter to Marshall, which Marshall annotated and sent on to Foxwell. She apologises for having put him to trouble unintentionally about writing a notice of her husband's contributions as an economist. Also, when she wrote she had not seen the notice in "the Academy" which she expects says nearly all there is to say.

Summary	"I have made rather a fool of myself about London Univ. I happened not to see any advertisement of it. But I looked in the Calendar and found that the election was at the end of April. So I have only just sent in my application [for examinership], and today it is returned to me by Milman with the statement that the real selection is done, though the formal election is not till April 25th. I feel rather silly but I hope to survive." Asks when he can come and talk shop with Foxwell.

Summary	Delighted that [John Neville] Keynes has got the London Examinership. Hopes Moral Sciences Board will give him plenty of scope in Cambridge. Assumes Foxwell has heard from [Henry] Sidgwick that the Marshalls are to go to Oxford rather than Cambridge. Feel they ought to go "where there are vast flocks of untended sheep without (economic) shepherds rather than where there are many able shepherds with but few sheep. I don't suppose that we will be able to get our crooks round the ankles of many of the Oxford sheep; they are too much out of the way of treating economics as a serious study: still we can try." Summary	"I thought at first you were referring to the diagram which is the third in the list of [William Stanley] Jevons' work in Appendix II of his Th[eory] of Pol[itical] Econ[omy]. I had at the time forgotten that he had published a separate one on Banking. I have never seen that and don't know what it is like, but I can't think it can be comparable in importance to this other one, that relating to the Fund, price of wheat, etc. I don't see any sufficient cause for such things being charted weekly. Moreover the juice of the subject has been in a great measure brought out in [R.H.Inglis] Palgrave's Bank rate which has an immense mass of statistics of the kind in question.
Summary	"The price of wheat diagram could be completed in a few hours' work; and that should I think be done. But I should think the other is hardly worth while. The figures for the former are nearly all in the Statistical Abstract."

Summary	"It is difficult to give a short answer to your flattering-coaxing letter.
Summary	"As general proposition I maintain that it is more important to establish truth than to confute error; and that controversy should be left to people with sound digestions.
Summary	"It seems to me infinitely more important that I should solve difficulties which still perplex me than that I should tilt at a successful rhetorician. The one thing that he [Henry George] says which is important, I think, is that economists are - to outward appearance at least - at loggerheads with one another. I would rather put in one brick where it should be in the slowly rising economic edifice than plant a hundred brickbats with the utmost dexterity exactly between the eyes of Mr. George.
Summary	"Still the book has had so many buyers (though I doubt whether one in fifty of them has read to the end) that I almost determined to publish something about him. My weak point was that I did not know what to attack: a book as large as his own would be wanted to refute all his fallacies. But I hoped I should find out, in the course of my lectures at Bristol, which of his fallacies had stuck. I failed utterly."
Summary	Complains that he encountered no opposition at Bristol to his attacks on George.
Summary	"Still I was wavering: then I heard of Toynbee's death: and that disinclined me to act for the time: I did not want to say anything in any way opposed to Toynbee: and I thought I would wait. Then came the Oxford post that meant a great deal of reading about India involving a good break in my writing. Now I am writing, but in September I must begin to read India again."
Summary	Will defy Oxford pupils to prefer George's to Mill's doctrines "as found in the economics of industry."
Summary	"(As to the laws of D.R. and I.R. I admit that the account in the Economics of Industry is incomplete. We had intended to go into it more thoroughly in discussing American protectionist theories, in the Economics of trade and finance.)
Summary	"Well, by this means, I shall find out which of George's fallacies are worth attacking, and if I find that the book is not already fast loosing its hold (which I expect) I shall probably write a review article or two at Xmas or Easter.
Summary	"What you say about Heitlund is important. I am not sure what he thinks: but if he really is taken by George, he is the only hard headed man whom I know, who is. I had a talk with [Henry Raime] Beeton. But I thought he was not [word underlined] hard headed. He seemed to me to swallow everything in George; and I got no nearer knowing what to attack.

Summary	"Sidgwick has written urging me to publish Prog[ress] and Pov[erty] lectures. It is hard lines for one who hates controversy more than he does George to be forced into controversy: but I suppose I must do something at the beginning of next year. At present I am engaged in making up my own mind about difficulties. I do an average of 2 hours a day at that if I do nothing else all day: but I cant do it at all when half occupied with other things. So I cant spare time to think of [Henry] George now. As to [John Stuart] Mill I agree that he is literary: and therefore full of errors. But I think he and [David] Ricardo contain the kernel of truth. As to definitions, I have written the part of the new book that relates to them in a radical spirit agreeing much with [William Stanley] Jevons. A 2/6 book must be conservative in definition. Postscript: "You ought to answer George."

Summary	Asks if Foxwell will second the nomination of Bolton King, a Balliol B.A., for membership in the [Royal] Statistical Society. "I am getting to care about statistics a good deal, not to work at myself: I have not the time. But I think it is just the work for rich young Oxford men who can afford to buy clerical assistance. I hope gradually to get several, and I want to make a beginning with King." Discusses his reluctance to go out on Sundays because he needs the time to "let down".

Summary	"I have written him [possibly Miller] a long letter. Summary: Prize essays on big subjects are tosh. But on little subjects, subsidiary to big ones, they do good to readers as well as writers, particularly if they are rather fact-y.

Summary	"I inclose the paper of which I spoke. The discussion at the Board [respecting Moral Sciences Tripos] was not hostile [Resolution II"]; Marshall is "inclined to drop I altogether and press II".
Summary	"I should like I as it stands: because it would have the effect of starting people on original work before they leave; at all events in their fourth or fifth years. But the difficulties raised during our talk have seemed to grow since then; and I am not very zealous for specializing studies on an area too large to yield good fruit to the spontaneous activity of the student.
Summary	"Perhaps I should have said that I do not like Theory History Policy because I do not think there is any "theory" to speak of: and analysis is unprofitable when separated from the study of facts:
Summary	"So if I were to try to classify economics, which I dont [word heavily underlined], it would be somehow thuswise:- i. Unanalytical acquaintance with leading facts as a basis (i.e. a ground work in the description and simple history which set forth records of events and conditions and circumstances of life and action) - most people know enough from the ordinary converse of life to be able to pass by this stage.
Summary	ii. Elementary qualitative iii. Compound qualitative iv. Quantitative - NB only of some [word underlined] not all facts [ii, iii and iv bracketed together as:] study of facts
Summary	v. Simple general vi. Complex general vii. Detailed and Technical [v, vi and vii bracketed together as:] Synthesis or "applied economics" in subordination to ideals and aims
Summary	"About that is what I should say if I did say anything in a hurry. But I dont say anything." Forgot to take paper about London University: please send it.
Summary	With two of Alfred Marshall's visiting-cards written on in pencil: "Card I I wanted to ask you what you think of plan of making 3rd papers on Economics in new Part II of M Sc Tripos consist of many questions of which no one may do more than two: also of requiring each candidate (for a first class Q.) to specify beforehand some part of the subject on which he wishes to be examined fully e.g. Banking or Public Finance or Literary Hist. of economics in XVIII century: & lastly
Summary	Card II arranging that two of questions in this third paper should be set on each of the special subjects thus chosen This plan would give freedom to teachers & to students to specialize while the two general papers would secure against danger of over specialization. I fancy this would be in the direction of your wishes. A.M. 1.30 Thursday"

Summary	Having studied Foxwell's Society of Arts Syllabus, thinks there are no significant differences between them on how history should be studied, merely differences of wording. He has drafted a preamble. Discusses wording.

Summary	Apparently part of a bundle of letters from Marshall to Foxwell presented by Foxwell's daughter Audrey to Mary Paley Marshall in 1938. She in turn sent them to J. M. Keynes under cover of a letter of 22 June 1938 [Foxwell 1/82]. He presumably deposited them in the Marshall Library.

Summary	"It is so urgently necessary to get our draft scheme out this week, that I think it will be best for me to come to your rooms on Friday at 1.5 to see what you think of this scheme. I will then rewrite it as far as is necessary and take or send it to Keynes and Sidgwick on the same day.
Summary	"I began with a preamble (p.1). But when I came to read it, I did not like its general effect. It seemed too hortative for the Calendar, and I did not like defining Economics as concerned only with the Nature, Consumption, Production and Distribution of Wealth.
Summary	"So I afterwards wrote pp. A and B as alternative for p.1 and the first part of p.2.
Summary	Even now I am not satisfied. I don't like having Method put at the top. I hold that people can't judge what are the best methods of economics, till they know a good deal of the science.
Summary	"So I should like to cut out I on p.A and to add a paragraph about Method and scope, fundamental notions, definitions etc. at the end before the list of books: So as to imply that these matters were to be discussed not at the beginning nor the end, but in the course of the main study of economics."

Summary	"I. Every candidate shall be invited, when sending in his name for examination, to state whether there be any subject in Political Economy to which he has devoted special attention: and opportunity shall be afforded him, by means of alternative questions, especially in the third paper, to obtain credit for any knowledge he may have of such special subject.

Summary	"I do not know what to say to you: you are too good to me." Knows that he does not focus his work enough, Dicey told him the same, but must concentrate on solving his difficulties, not on form. If Vol. II ever finished, thinks of preparing some semi-popular lectures and then working them up into "a sort of Tourists guide to Marshall". Finds it easier to follow the methods of the impressionists when speaking than when writing.
Summary	Believes [Frank William] Taussig had criticised Marshall's theory of distribution in the MS of his book, but after discussion found there had been misunderstanding. Marshall had told him that the next edition [of the 'Principles'] would hopefully guard against such misunderstanding, but Taussig had not received that edition in time to use it; "and I think that may have been a cause of his silence about me. He seems to me to ring as true as steel: I cannot conceive him ever doing anything unworthy."
Summary	Postscript: Agrees with some of Foxwell's criticism of [John Stuart] Mill, but still holds the latter in high esteem.

Summary	Apparently part of a bundle of letters from Marshall to Foxwell presented by Foxwell's daughter to Mary Paley Marshall in 1938. She in turn sent them to J. M. Keynes under cover of a letter of 22 June 1938 [Foxwell 1/82]. He presumably deposited them in the Marshall Library.

Summary	"Soldier awake! You have never done what you had proposed if the debate in the Senate House [on the admission of women to membership in the University] had extended to the fourth day; and now seems to me the time. I inclose a nearly complete set of the correspondence in the Times. One or two of the first letters are missing, but they are not relevant. Keep them as long as you really want them and then please return them.
Summary	"Browne and Allbutt are always good, but I do not think they have reached their highest level in this discussion. Whibley lacks finish and reserve (tho less so in the Times than in the XIX Century). The only [word underlined] first class controversialist on our side so far has been an Oxford man - Strachan Davidson. He I think is splendid.
Summary	"And now Peile has repeated with a judicious mixture of effrontery and moderation of tone the verbally true statement that the Report proposes to confer no new rights in the University on Women.
Summary	"I would write were it not for three reasons. a. I have done my share. b. The fact that my wife is of Newnham, and that - bar undergraduates - three fourths of the people who come to this house are Newnham or Girton students present or past, makes it difficult for me to say anything and impossible to say some things that ought to be said. c. I have not the literary faculty. You are one of the very few [two words underlined] on our side that have it. We have a good many hard workers and hard thinkers among us: but those who are deft with their pen are mainly on the other side. Surely now if ever is the time for you to strike in.
Summary	"Your special point is that which now needs to be urged. Viz that this concession is desired by the other side not so much for what it is as for what it can be worked for, as history shows. The need to drive this home is most urgent, and now that Parliament is away, people will read the letters in the Times.
Summary	"I do not know whether you noticed that [William] Bateson in his letter published in the Syndicate's Report gave a new illustration of the tactics of his side. When 2000 people said that a matter needed inquiry, or were told rightly, it would be tyrannical to refuse it even tho we saw no reason for it: Now that the inquiry has been granted we are told that shows a universal agreement that the time had come for inquiry.
Summary	"Soldier awake! Now is the time and you have got to do your share. It is important work: it is just your work. Awake! Awake!"
Free field	Note in Marshall's hand at top of front page, underlined throughout: "If in a hurry read only at first Peile's letter in the last cutting."

Summary	Apparently part of a bundle of letters from Marshall to Foxwell presented by Foxwell's daughter to Mary Paley Marshall in 1938. She in turn sent them to J. M. Keynes under cover of a letter of 22 June 1938 [Foxwell 1/82]. He presumably deposited them in the Marshall Library.

Summary	"Hardy is very well in his way: but he is no match for the strategists of the other side. They know that if they can throw dust in the eyes of non-residents, they will win: a hundred flys [sic] which reach only the residents notwithstanding. Browne, who is a strategist, wrote to me to that effect last year. [John] Peile's letter is I think a masterpiece as addressed to non-residents. And it is just as easy to write for the Times as to write a fly. On this subject also you would be in harmony with the Times.
Summary	"If we are beaten by non-resident votes, you will have a considerable share of responsibility. There is a great mass of sentiment in St John's as to the danger of bribing hundreds of low-grade women students to Cambridge, and the hollowness of the pretended motives by which the movement is marked. But it is a candle "under a bushel": you are one of the very few who could "set it on a hill"."

Summary	Pleas with Foxwell not to sell his books, which will appreciate in value if held. Spending less time on his library would release time to write for newspapers and journals, a gift he should use more, even though Marshall knows that in a few areas Foxwell will support views with which Marshall differs. Asks Foxwell to seek advice from others and not act hastily. Should be frank with Mr Dorrington. Salutation: "Beloved Fox". W.E. Dorrington was to become Foxwell's father-in-law the following year

Summary	Discusses Foxwell's views on value of money. "I wish "Bimetallists" [capital B underlined 4 times] were not so free with the word "jockey": as a bimetallist [lower case b underlined once] I should suspect those who use the term freely of having bought silver securities cheap and wanting to get i. a good rate of interest ii. a good rate per rupee or Mexican dollar. Ugh!
Summary	"I used to adore the Gibbs that controverted Bonamy Price. Why should he besmirch his old age? I will not mention the word bimetallism before the Committee [1898 Indian Currency Committee] if I can help it. I have reasons to believe that i. Lubbock was expected (invited?) to give evidence ii. that he has not given it yet. Lord Northbrook gave some high-minded evidence (38 columns) on Nov. 4. It obviously swayed opinion."
Summary	Discusses his sister's broken hip.
Summary	Mentions part of Lord Northbrook's evidence with which he disagrees.
Summary	Will give Foxwell some gossip once the Committee has published its report.

Summary	Attaches "Scheme for an Economic and Political Sciences Tripos" and reading list and discusses his proposals for a separate Economics Tripos under the same Board as the Historical Tripos. Attaches a second copy of the scheme which he asks Foxwell to transmit to [John Neville] Keynes. At a meeting of the Historical Board, he said if "our studies were made to give no room for what business men want, we must expect their money to go to new Universities; and we should continue money-starved. I find that some thought I was going for a "commercial school": That is almost as good a joke as the suggestion of the Times leader-writer of yesterday that it was unfair of Harcourt to discredit my opinions on taxation, by recalling my errors as a Bimetallist. But Harcourt was [word underlined] subtle."

Summary	"Plans for 1901-2" describes Marshall's intention to lecture on the main principles of economics, starting where his first volume ends. Wishes to avoid necessity of elementary explanations, therefore course will not be suitable for most first and second year students. Lists minimum preliminary reading necessary for third or fourth year students who have already done "hard work in other subjects". Better to read a few books carefully than to read many.
Summary	On reverse, "Short List of Books on Economics Supplementary to the Tripos Lists." Books listed under following headings: A. General Treatises, B. Labour, C. Money and Credit, D. International Trade, E. Speculation and Combination, F. Taxation, G. Collective Action and Aims. Books marked with asterisks are among those Marshall particularly recommends to be read before starting his course.

Summary	Refers to his views on Bimetallism, his opinion that Symmetallism is theoretically better than Bimetallism, and the view he has developed in the last year or two that gold Monometallism "seems to me to [be] a simpler cosmopolitan solution for the first half of the XXth century: I don't suppose it will remain a workable scheme for a very long time: perhaps not more than a century or two." Fisher's kind of Bimetallism makes him furious.
Summary	Was aware that George Darwin was trying to interest [Andrew] Carnegie in Cambridge University. "But it never occurred to me to suggest that he should ask Carnegie to stump up for modern economic teaching, still less for elderly books on economics.
Summary	"I wish myself that the University would develop its modern side, just for a few years. While our young men can't be taught the economics of their own age, I don't like to press the University to supply them with more books relating to past times. Perhaps I am wrong. I wish I knew what to do." Closes: "Yours in sympathy and perplexity".

Summary	Responds to Foxwell's comments on his latest proposals on the focus and content of an economics trip [see Foxwell 1/64/1-3].
Summary	"I do not [word underlined] think that every science trains faculties in that way which is best for every other science. I think psychology is an important study in itself; but that its methods are remarkably useless for the economist. As studied now it deals almost exclusively with introspection and study of individual life. Economics wants social psychology, i.e. inductive observation of men's motives in masses and subdivisions of masses. Also psychology is weaker as a science than economics: and economics is too young and weak to carry others."
Summary	He and Foxwell will not agree about the relevance of Logic in the training of economists. Concerning politics "I do not want much of them. For the economist at all events, modern international general history: and a little analysis of structure and functions of the Modern State on the comparative method suffices I think. But [Goldsworthy Lowes] Dickinson has larger views: and I think he ought to be heard."

Summary	Apparently part of a bundle of letters from Marshall to Foxwell presented by Foxwell's daughter to Mary Paley Marshall in 1938. She in turn sent them to J. M. Keynes under cover of a letter of 22 June 1938 [Foxwell 1/82]. He presumably deposited them in the Marshall Library.
Content
Summary	Continues discussion of the focus of the new Economics Tripos, in particular with reference to the mediocre quality of undergraduates in recent years taking the Moral Sciences Tripos, whose content fails to attract first class minds. Complains that Moral Science Tripos has in effect become a post-graduate degree for men from other universities. Cites specific examples of good and bad. "In my opinion Part I of Mo[ral] Sc[iences] Tripos is too easy for people who have familiarized themselves with its ground notions at another University. Several men of that kind seem to me to have got first classes who have not first class minds e.g. Sen [P.K.], and - worse still - Dockray (and most horrible of all Miss [M.J.] Reep: but I am not counting women)."
Summary	"The Mo[ral] Sc[iences] men, except the ablest are mere parasites of textbooks: they know nothing and seem to care nothing about real life. And the oppression and suppression of economics by the incubus of Moral Sciences seems to me at once so cruel and so great a national evil, that I should be a traitor to my trust if I allowed my personal regard for [John Neville] Keynes and others to prevent me from appealing to the judgment of the impartial University for redress."
Summary	Regrets amount of time he has had to spend, and asks Foxwell if he can suggest ways of making Marshall's arguments less displeasing to Keynes.
Summary	Is strongly opposed to memory questions at University, thinks memory counts for comparatively little in the modern treatment of history. "I confess however that Pigou who has no [word underlined] memory was rather bothered by the want of it in the History Tripos."
Free field	2 annotations at top of first sheet, in Marshall's hand: "Keynes wrote a letter which I have not been able to answer. This partly answers it. Would you be so kind as to show him this. And Oh Keynes! please forgive!!" "[William] Cunningham has not made any answer to my letter enclosing a draft of my paper."

Summary	Outlines "a possible grouping of papers on the subjects indicated above between Parts I and II of a Tripos". "The only purpose therefore of this sketch is to indicate the relative proportions which I should myself feel inclined to assign to the different subjects in the curriculum" for students mainly interested in Economics rather than planning on a diplomatic or other political career.
Free field	Apparently part of a printed petition to the Senate of the University, of which the earlier part is missing. Possibly a proof. Stamped "University Press Cambridge, 17 February 1902". Content
Summary	Discusses difficulties of reconciling claims of various disciplines to have a role in training economists, as reflected in the debates surrounding the content of the proposed Economics Tripos. "The last paragraph on p.16 was put in as an apology for withdrawing those which I have marked with a red A and a red B on the inclosed slips from the earlier draft." [See Foxwell 1/70/2] Asks Foxwell to show letter to [John Neville] Keynes. Has written several hundred sheets on this topic in the last month and is very weary.

Summary	Discusses in detail the division of lecturing between himself, Foxwell and [David Hutchison] Macgregor, and the dangers of duplication or gaps. Suggests Foxwell teach English economic history in the 19th century, and recommends that he admit Newnham and Girton students to his lectures. "If they are to be examined, - and I confess I think that too many of them do [word underlined] enter for our Triposes - we ought not to handicap them by excluding them from lectures that are almost necessary." Considers it inappropriate to have a "General Course" in the third year. "I think I am expected to cover more than my share of the whole area. I am willing to be responsible for a half of the third year teaching; or even a little more if need be."

Content
Summary	Thanks Foxwell for full and clear reply to his earlier letter [presumably that of 8 February 1906, see Foxwell 1/72/1]. Praises him as an expositor. Considers that their differences of approach, where they exist, are beneficial. Describes his own approach to teaching, his technique of winnowing out those pupils who are unprepared, and his dislike of repeating in his lectures ground covered by the 'Principles'. "I work by illustration as far as possible: scarcely ever giving facts for the sake of information, but being rather glad to get them in, when they can be used as a means of forcing people to think." That Foxwell does not lay enough stress on reasoning "is the only [word underlined] objection which, as far as I am aware, I have ever raised to your lectures." Feels Foxwell's replacement by a younger man would be a calamity.
Summary	Agrees students ought to do some drudgery and thus suggested [David Hutchison] Macgregor should give full first-year course.
Summary	Once there are satisfactory courses for the compulsory papers and for the central parts of the four advanced papers in Part II, "I think it will be a very great gain to have a special course on Socialism. (But, to be frank, I think no-one can lecture safely on German Socialism without having studied recent writings, including Marx's Capital Vols. II and III, and other posthumous works. I have not read them...I have looked at them sufficiently to think they do not save Marx's position. But I should not be willing to lecture on the subject till I had read two or three thousand pages of recent German literature...)"
Summary	Another subject of the same kind is the history of English economic theory. He has noticed that almost no pupils borrow books on the subject, although he always offers them to third-year students.
Summary	Since Foxwell is unwilling to lecture on English economic history, the only apparent solution "is to add on someone else's lectures on Economics at the end of yours. I think that the present plan under which freshmen have their choice only between a set of lectures addressed mainly to historical students, and one which consists only of two lectures during each of two terms, while they are inundated with lectures on history, is unendurable."
Summary	Is extremely sorry to learn of Foxwell's heart trouble, and insists that Foxwell should only undertake what he feels like doing. Proposes a time for a meeting to discuss their two letters.

Summary	[Ernest Stewart] Roberts had decided to request four lecturers [for the Economics Faculty] at £200 a year each, hoping they may be forthcoming. "I certainly agree about [Charles Ryle] Fay. I know a good deal about his essay, though I have not read it. I think it is a splendid piece of work, and the energy with which he is throwing himself into his lectures is a glory and a delight to behold. He is a most splendid man, probably the best for attracting men to the Tripos that could be had anywhere."

Summary	"Pigou is in my opinion likely [to] be recognized ere long as a man of quite extraordinary genius: and I hoped he would be elected to the Professorship". Expresses his gratitude for all that Foxwell has done for him. Summary	Given by Alan Beeton, son of Henry Beeton, to Miss Foxwell in 1937, thinking they may be of interest to the biographer, presumably John Maynard Keynes. Keynes may have presented them to the Marshall Library.
Content
Summary	Had no time to call on him, presumes it was about the Manifesto [about bimetallism] which is dropped for the present. "Marshall has referred the matter to Keynes - a very level headed man - who however inclines to Marshall's side.
Summary	"Marshall is always a man whom it is extremely difficult to work with. He is opinionated, and perhaps inclined to value his opinions too highly. Moreover knowing nothing of English bimetallists he is filled with suspicion of them. In fact he regards them as unmitigatedly soft money men - most unfairly of course.
Summary	"I showed him [Sir William] Houldsworth's comments on his Manifesto. This produced just the effect I expected. He fell in love with Houldsworth on the spot. He thought the temper of the comments admirable.
Summary	"If he could only be got to meet Houldsworth at dinner I should not despair of his joining the League. As to argument you might as well argue with [Robert] Giffen. Each man thinks he has exhausted the subject. But Marshall is extremely kind and generous with it all. He is an odd personality - but he is a high-minded honourable man and I should be sorry to quarrel with him, even if he would let me."

Summary	Given by Alan Beeton, son of Henry Beeton, to Miss Foxwell in 1937, thinking they may be of interest to the biographer, presumably John Maynard Keynes. Keynes may have presented them to the Marshall Library.
Content
Summary	"The unfortunate phrase in your Manifesto which caused an explosion on Marshall's part was the phrase "in matters of detail". If it had been "on some important matters of principle", I think he might have signed it, for he was in a very good mood, being delighted by the evident candour and fairness of some criticism of [Sir William] Houldsworth which I ventured to show him, knowing how they would strike him.
Summary	"Just now I am extremely busy with the Commission [on Bimetallism?] and Chaplin all day.
Summary	"There is no hurry about the Manifesto. It has gone to Keynes.
Summary	"If you alienate Marshall you give a blow to this movement the importance of which it would be difficult to exaggerate. Goschen has the highest regard for Marshall, and he will carry half the Economists with him: e.g. Edgeworth certainly, Bonar and Keynes probably: others will be much shaken in the confidence with which they had previously held their views.
Summary	"Lunching with M[arshall] on Monday he observed, during the genial half hour which usually succeeds a judicious meal, "There is really not much difference between our views" - but he quickly added, "But that difference is most [word underlined] important."
Summary	"There you have it exactly."

Summary	Given by Alan Beeton, son of Henry Beeton, to Miss Foxwell in 1937, thinking they may be of interest to the biographer, presumably John Maynard Keynes. Keynes may have presented them to the Marshall Library.
Content
Summary	Believes it highly dangerous to send Marshall "the letter enclosed".
Summary	"He is not likely at present to pronounce as strongly for bi-metallism as he has several times done in printed paper. What will happen if you goad him against his will into speaking is that he will so qualify his former expressions that every practical man will regard him as really hostile to bi-metallism. There is no doubt he is hostile to bi-metallists. The man most likely to sooth and coax him is [Sir William] Houldsworth: but H[ouldsworth] is strongly in favour of letting Marshall alone. M[arshall] is very obstinate. If you dont seem to want him, he may come in: but the more pressure you put on him the more he bucks up.
Summary	"As long as Courtney is able unchallenged to make the statement he made at the Mansion House, we have all we are likely to get. But I have been most anxious lest some contradiction should appear. In fact I dread it so much that I should hardly like again to repeat the statement. Bastable is against us: and God only knows what Edgeworth might say.
Summary	"If Balfour had said what Courtney did, I am certain we should have had an indignant letter from Marshall in The Times the next day. This would be perdition."

Summary	Asks Darwin for support in his application for the post of Organising Chair of the Faculty of Economics in the new University of Birmingham. Finds Sidney Webb's domination at London University insupportable. Refers to his qualifications, the lack of prospect of a post at Cambridge, and his need for "something substantial and permanent." Refers to certain prejudices against his candidature. Apologises for being a nuisance.

Summary	Given to the Marshall Library by Margaret Keynes [daughter of Sir George Darwin] through her husband, Sir Geoffrey Keynes, 8 May 1967.
Content
Summary	Those opposed to his candidacy for the professorship at Birmingham [see Foxwell 1/87 and 1/88] on the grounds that he is not a businessman are also citing his support of bimetallism as a point against him. Has had generous letter from Giffen saying, "unhesitatingly there is no better teacher upon banking and currency". Also has support of business men.
Summary	"Our Master [William H. Bateson], as you know, is not an enthusiast, especially in the case of his own men: and Marshall, who has written very kindly, really prefers [William James] Ashley and is too honest not to allow this to be seen." Is grieved to bother Darwin about such a troublesome business. Has put Darwin's name down in a list of references.

Summary	Describes the plight of Middleton who called on him at University College [London], claiming to have invented a submarine. Wants a few Cambridge men to put up money to build a larger model. Claims to have solved the problem of stability, which the Admiralty has not. He has 15 children none able to earn, and has been cheated out of property in Virginia. Foxwell too short of funds to be able to help, sends Middleton's statement of affairs [now wanting] on to Darwin.
